Living cultural landscapes and the challenge of tourism

As “combined works of nature and humankind” that “express a long and intimate relationship between peoples and their natural environment”, living cultural landscapes are characterized by their strong anthropic dimension. The concept of living cultural landscape requires taking into consideration the relationship between topography and the contributions, traces and memories of those who have shaped it, not only as a legacy of the past, but also as a dynamic and continuous construction of those who live there on a daily basis.

A complex and polysemous concept, living cultural landscapes give rise to specific questions on their tourism development, in a different sense from that of other World Heritage sites which are more restricted geographically and thematically:

* The boundaries of cultural landscapes raise the complex issue of their tourism development, as there may be a lack of overall coherence and consistency between the perimeter inscribed on the World Heritage List and the “destination”. Should the creation of a tourist destination correspond precisely to the administrative UNESCO perimeter – as it is specifically this perimeter that receives prestigious World Heritage recognition – or should tourism development coincide with the territorial boundaries of the cultural landscape? What are the relationships or the potential sources of competition with existing destinations located within or near the established perimeter?

* The notion of living cultural landscapes implies the existence of productive activities, the sustainability of the latter being directly related to the inscription of the former. Accordingly, it is necessary to identify the limitations induced from tourism activities that not only contribute to the aestheticization and museumification of these places, but, through their introduction into the area concerned, may also hinder other economic activities.

* The sometimes considerable number of actors involved in these complex areas requires an analysis of their role and positioning in the development, communication and creation of a new destination. What tourism governance could be created in order to ensure harmony between actors with different objectives?

* Living cultural landscapes are places to live and work for the local populations. The expectations of these different worlds – those who live in, work in, and visit these areas – are not always the same. Thus the “tourism development” of living cultural landscapes is not systematically devoid of conflict and tension. How can the encounter between the permanent inhabitants of these landscapes and short-term visitors or tourists be ensured?

This 6th UNESCO Chair seminar will address each of these questions, drawing on several examples of living cultural landscapes in France and abroad. The morning session will focus on vine and wine landscapes, emblematic of issues concerning the creation of wine tourism destinations in connection with UNESCO sites, and the relationship between production landscapes and tourism consumption. The afternoon session will seek to extend these questions to all types of cultural landscapes.

The UNESCO Chair

“CULTURE, TOURISM, DEVELOPMENT”

It was in the spirit of sharing knowledge and human culture that, in 1998, in cooperation with UNESCO and in close collaboration with its Institute for Research and Higher Studies in Tourism (IREST), Université Paris 1 Panthéon-Sorbonne founded the UNESCO Chair in “Culture, Tourism, Development”.

Policy goals recommended by the Organisation include ensuring that the tourism industry respects culture and the environment, and that the revenues it generates are also used to equitably preserve heritage resources and to strengthen cultural development and promote academic mobility and rapid knowledge transfer, via twinning initiatives, networking and other linking mechanisms, especially by electronic means.

The Chair’s objective is to promote a holistic system of research activities, education, information, and documentation that contributes to cultural tourism strategies for sustainable development. Additionally, the long-term preservation of Heritage sites can be ensured, along with the involvement of local populations in cultural projects and the benefits of tourism activities, all while fostering cross-cultural dialogue. The Chair’s activities also contribute to subregional, regional, and interregional cooperation between internationally-renowned high-level researchers and professors and researcher-lecturers of the University.
